

'All is well, Boris Ivanovitch.'

He nodded murmuring: 'I do not think I have been followed.'

But there was anxiety in his tone. He went to the window, drawing the curtains aside slightly, and peering carefully out. He started away violently.

'There are two men—on the opposite pavement. It looks to me—' He broke off and began gnawing at his nails—a habit he had when anxious.

The Russian girl was shaking her head with a slow, reassuring action.

'They were here before you came.'

'All the same, it looks to me as though they were watching this house.'

'Possibly,' she admitted indifferently.

'But then—'

'What of it? Even if they know—it will not be you they will follow from here.'

A thin, cruel smile came to his lips.

'No,' he admitted, 'that is true.'

He mused for a minute or two and then observed:

'This damned American—he can look after himself as well as anybody.'

'I suppose so.'

He went again to the window.

'Tough customers,' he muttered, with a chuckle. 'Known to the police, I fear. Well, well, I wish Brother Apache good hunting.'

Olga Demiroff shook her head.

'If the American is the kind of man they say he is, it will take more than a couple of cowardly apaches to get the better of him.' She paused. 'I wonder—'

'Well?'

'Nothing. Only twice this evening a man has passed along this street—a man with white hair.'

'What of it?'

'This. As he passed those two men, he dropped his glove. One of them picked it up and returned it to him. A thread-bare device.'

'You mean—that the white-haired man is—their employer?'

'Something of the kind.'

The Russian looked alarmed and uneasy.

'You are sure—the parcel is safe? It has not been tampered with? There has been too much talk...much too much talk.'

He gnawed his nails again.

'Judge for yourself.'

She bent to the fireplace, deftly removing the coals. Underneath, from amongst the crumpled balls of newspaper, she selected from the very middle an oblong package wrapped round with grimy newspaper, and handed it to the man.

'Ingenious,' he said, with a nod of approval.

'The apartment has been searched twice. The mattress on my bed was ripped open.'

'It is as I said,' he muttered. 'There has been too much talk. This haggling over the price—it was a mistake.'

He had unwrapped the newspaper. Inside was a small brown paper parcel.

This in turn he unwrapped, verified the contents, and quickly wrapped it up once more. As he did so, an electric bell rang sharply.

'The American is punctual,' said Olga, with a glance at the clock.

She left the room. In a minute she returned ushering in a stranger, a big, broad-shouldered man whose transatlantic origin was evident. His keen glance went from one to the other.

'M. Krassine?' he inquired politely.

'I am he,' said Boris. 'I must apologize for—for the unconventionality of this meeting-place. But secrecy is urgent. I—I cannot afford to be connected with this business in any way.'

'Is that so?' said the American politely.

'I have your word, have I not, that no details of this transaction will be made public? That is one of the conditions of—sale.'

The American nodded.

'That has already been agreed upon,' he said indifferently. 'Now, perhaps, you will produce the goods.'

'You have the money—in notes?'

'Yes,' replied the other.

He did not, however, make any attempt to produce it. After a moment's hesitation, Krassine gestured towards the small parcel on the table.

The American took it up and unrolled the wrapping paper. The contents he took over to a small electric lamp and submitted them to a very thorough examination. Satisfied, he drew from his pocket a thick leather wallet and extracted from it a wad of notes. These he handed to the Russian, who counted them carefully.

‘All right?’

‘I thank you, Monsieur. Everything is correct.’

‘Ah!’ said the other. He slipped the brown paper parcel negligently into his pocket. He bowed to Olga. ‘Good evening, Mademoiselle. Good evening, M. Krassine.’

He went out shutting the door behind him. The eyes of the two in the room met. The man passed his tongue over his dry lips.

‘I wonder—will he ever get back to his hotel?’ he muttered.

By common accord, they both turned to the window. They were just in time to see the American emerge into the street below. He turned to the left and marched along at a good pace without once turning his head. Two shadows stole from a doorway and followed noiselessly. Pursuers and pursued vanished into the night. Olga Demiroff spoke.

‘He will get back safely,’ she said. ‘You need not fear—or hope—whichever it is.’

‘Why do you think he will be safe?’ asked Krassine curiously.

‘A man who has made as much money as he has could not possibly be a fool,’ said Olga. ‘And talking of money—’

She looked significantly at Krassine.

‘Eh?’

‘My share, Boris Ivanovitch.’

With some reluctance, Krassine handed over two of the notes. She nodded her thanks, with a complete lack of emotion, and tucked them away in her stocking.

‘That is good,’ she remarked, with satisfaction.

He looked at her curiously.

‘You have no regrets, Olga Vassilovna?’

‘Regrets? For what?’

‘For what has been in your keeping. There are women—most women, I believe, who go mad over such things.’

She nodded reflectively.

‘Yes, you speak truth there. Most women have that madness. I—have not. I wonder now—’ She broke off.

Chapter 1

The Man with the White Hair

IT was close on midnight when a man crossed the Place de la Concorde. In spite of the handsome fur coat which garbed his meagre form, there was something essentially weak and paltry about him.

A little man with a face like a rat. A man, one would say, who could never play a conspicuous part, or rise to prominence in any sphere. And yet, in leaping to such a conclusion, an onlooker would have been wrong. For this man, negligible and inconspicuous as he seemed, played a prominent part in the destiny of the world. In an Empire where rats ruled, he was the king of the rats.

Even now, an Embassy awaited his return. But he had business to do first—business of which the Embassy was not officially cognizant. His face gleamed white and sharp in the moonlight. There was the least hint of a curve in the thin nose. His father had been a Polish Jew, a journeyman tailor. It was business such as his father would have loved that took him abroad to-night.

He came to the Seine, crossed it, and entered one of the less reputable quarters of Paris. Here he stopped before a tall, dilapidated house and made his way up to an apartment on the fourth floor. He had barely time to knock before the door was opened by a woman who had evidently been awaiting his arrival. She gave him no greeting, but helped him off with his overcoat and then led the way into the tawdrily furnished sitting-room. The electric light was shaded with dirty pink festoons and it softened, but could not disguise, the girl's face with its mask of crude pain. Could not disguise, either, the broad Mongolian cast of her countenance. There was no doubt of Olga Demiroff's profession, nor of her nationality.

‘All is well, little one?’

Chapter 1: The Man with the White Hair

'Well?' asked the other curiously.

'The American will be safe with them—yes, I am sure of that. But afterwards—'

'Eh? What are you thinking of?'

'He will give them, of course, to some woman,' said Olga thoughtfully. 'I wonder what will happen then...'

She shook herself impatiently and went over to the window. Suddenly she uttered an exclamation and called to her companion.

'See, he is going down the street now—the man I mean.'

They both gazed down together. A slim, elegant figure was progressing along at a leisurely pace. He wore an opera hat and a cloak. As he passed a street lamp, the light illumined a tatch of thick white hair.

Dedicated to
TWO DISTINGUISHED MEMBERS
OF THE O.F.D.
CARLOTTA and PETER

Cast of Characters

Monsieur le Marquis, an elegant gentleman who merits his mask but not his white hairs

Demetrius Papopolous, a venerable dealer in unique antiques

Zia Papopolous, whose resemblance to her father, Demetrius, is more than physical

Rufus Van Aldin, a hard man, with plenty of hard cash

Major Richard Knighton, Van Aldin's secretary—quick, intelligent, and resourceful

Ruth Kettering, another daughter who resembles her father, Rufus Van Aldin

Derek Kettering, Ruth's husband, the future Lord Leconbury

Mirelle, an exotic dancer who was not made to be poor

Katherine Grey, a grey-eyed saint with a sense of humour—and a brand-new fortune

Viscountess Rosalie Tamplin, who has an eye (blue and charming) for a quick penny

The Honourable Lenox Tamplin, who does not resemble her mother

M. Hercule Poirot, the semiretired Belgian detective who is semimodest about admitting that he is always right

Ada Mason, lady's maid to Ruth Kettering, and English to the tip of her red nose

Comte Armand de la Roche, a plausible scoundrel with a fatal fascination for women

Chapter 2

M. le Marquis

THE man with the white hair continued on his course, unhurried, and seemingly indifferent to his surroundings. He took a side turning to the right and another one to the left. Now and then he hummed a little air to himself.

Suddenly he stopped dead and listened intently. He had heard a certain sound. It might have been the bursting of a tyre or it might have been—a shot. A curious smile played round his lips for a minute. Then he resumed his leisurely walk.

On turning a corner he came upon a scene of some activity. A representative of the law was making notes in a pocket-book, and one or two late passers-by had collected on the spot. To one of these the man with the white hair made a polite request for information.

‘Something has been happening, yes?’

‘Mais oui, Monsieur. Two apaches set upon an elderly American gentleman.’

‘They did him no injury?’

‘No, indeed.’ The man laughed. ‘The American, he had a revolver in his pocket, and before they could attack him, he fired shots so closely round them that they took alarm and fled. The police, as usual, arrived too late.’

‘Ah!’ said the inquirer.

He displayed no emotion of any kind.

Placidly and unconcernedly he resumed his nocturnal strolling. Presently he crossed the Seine and came into the richer areas of the city. It was some twenty minutes later that he came to a stop before a certain house in a quiet but aristocratic thoroughfare.

The shop, for shop it was, was a restrained and unpretentious one. D. Papopolous, dealer in antiques, was so known to fame that he needed no advertisement, and indeed most of his business was not done over a counter. M. Papopolous had a very handsome apartment of his own overlooking the Champs Élysées, and it might reasonably be supposed that he would have been found there and not at his place of business at such an hour, but the man with the white hair seemed confident of success as he pressed the obscurely placed bell, having first given a quick glance up and down the deserted street.

His confidence was not misplaced. The door opened and a man stood in the aperture. He wore gold rings in his ears and was of a swarthy cast of countenance.

‘Good evening,’ said the stranger. ‘Your master is within?’

‘The master is here, but he does not see chance visitors at this time of night,’ growled the other.

‘I think he will see me. Tell him that his friend M. le Marquis is here.’

The man opened the door a little wider and allowed the visitor to enter.

The man who gave his name as M. le Marquis had shielded his face with his hand as he spoke. When the man-servant returned with the information that M. Papopolous would be pleased to receive the visitor a further change had taken place in the stranger’s appearance. The man-servant must have been very unobservant or very well trained for he betrayed no surprise at the small black satin mask which hid the other’s features. Leading the way to a door at the end of the hall, he opened it and announced in a respectful murmur: ‘M. le Marquis.’

The figure which rose to receive this strange guest was an imposing one. There was something venerable and patriarchal about M. Papopolous. He had a high domed forehead and a beautiful white beard. His manner had in it something ecclesiastical and benign.

‘My dear friend,’ said M. Papopolous.

He spoke in French and his tones were rich and unctuous.

‘I must apologize,’ said the visitor, ‘for the lateness of the hour.’

‘Not at all. Not at all,’ said M. Papopolous—‘an interesting time of night. You have had, perhaps, an interesting evening?’

‘Not personally,’ said M. le Marquis.

18	Derek Lunches	117
19	An Unexpected Visitor	121
20	Katherine Makes a Friend	129
21	At the Tennis	135
22	M. Papopolous Breakfasts	145
23	A New Theory	151
24	Poirot Gives Advice	155
25	Defiance	161
26	A Warning	167
27	Interview with Mirelle	175
28	Poirot Plays the Squirrel	185
29	A Letter From Home	195
30	Miss Viner Gives Judgment	205
31	Mr Aarons Lunches	213
32	Katherine and Poirot Compare Notes	217
33	A New Theory	223
34	The Blue Train Again	227
35	Explanations	231

Contents

Cast of Characters	v
1 The Man with the White Hair	1
2 M. le Marquis	7
3 Heart of Fire	11
4 In Curzon Street	15
5 A Useful Gentleman	21
6 Mirelle	29
7 Letters	35
8 Lady Tamplin Writes a Letter	43
9 An Offer Refused	51
10 On the Blue Train	57
11 Murder	67
12 At the Villa Marguerite	77
13 Van Aldin Gets a Telegram	85
14 Ada Mason's Story	89
15 The Comte de la Roche	95
16 Poirot Discusses the Case	101
17 An Aristocratic Gentleman	109

'Not personally,' repeated M. Papopolous, 'no, no, of course not. And there is news, eh?'

He cast a sharp glance sideways at the other, a glance that was not ecclesiastical or benign in the least.

'There is no news. The attempt failed. I hardly expected anything else.'

'Quite so,' said M. Papopolous; 'anything crude—'

He waved his hand to express his intense distaste for crudity in any form. There was indeed nothing crude about M. Papopolous nor about the goods he handled. He was well known in most European courts, and kings called him Demetrius in a friendly manner. He had the reputation for the most exquisite discretion. That, together with the nobility of his aspect, had carried him through several very questionable transactions.

'The direct attack—' said M. Papopolous. He shook his head. 'It answers sometimes—but very seldom.'

The other shrugged his shoulders.

'It saves time,' he remarked, 'and to fail costs nothing—or next to nothing. The other plan—will not fail.'

'Ah,' said M. Papopolous, looking at him keenly. The other nodded slowly.

'I have great confidence in your—er—reputation,' said the antique dealer. M. le Marquis smiled gently.

'I think I may say,' he murmured, 'that your confidence will not be misplaced.'

'You have unique opportunities,' said the other, with a note of envy in his voice.

'I make them,' said M. le Marquis.

He rose and took up the cloak which he had thrown carelessly on the back of a chair.

'I will keep you informed, M. Papopolous, through the usual channels, but there must be no hitch in your arrangements.'

M. Papopolous was pained.

'There is never a hitch in my arrangements,' he complained.

The other smiled, and without any further word of adieu he left the room, closing the door behind him.

The Mystery of the Blue Train

M. Papopolous remained in thought for a moment stroking his venerable white beard, and then moved across to a second door which opened inwards. As he turned the handle, a young woman, who only too clearly had been leaning against it with her ear to the keyhole, stumbled headlong into the room. M. Papopolous displayed neither surprise nor concern. It was evidently all quite natural to him.

‘Well, Zia?’ he asked.

‘I did not hear him go,’ explained Zia.

She was a handsome young woman, built on Junoesque lines, with dark flashing eyes and such a general air of resemblance to M. Papopolous that it was easy to see they were father and daughter.

‘It is annoying,’ she continued vexedly, ‘that one cannot see through a keyhole and hear through it at the same time.’

‘It has often annoyed me,’ said M. Papopolous, with great simplicity.

‘So that is M. le Marquis,’ said Zia slowly. ‘Does he always wear a mask, father?’

‘Always.’

There was a pause.

‘It is the rubies, I suppose?’ asked Zia.

Her father nodded.

‘What do you think, my little one?’ he inquired, with a hint of amusement in his beady black eyes.

‘Of M. le Marquis?’

‘Yes.’

‘I think,’ said Zia slowly, ‘that it is a very rare thing to find a well-bred Englishman who speaks French as well as that.’

‘Ah,’ said M. Papopolous, ‘so that is what you think.’

As usual, he did not commit himself, but he regarded Zia with benign approval.

‘I thought, too,’ said Zia, ‘that his head was an odd shape.’

‘Massive,’ said her father—‘a trifle massive. But then that effect is always created by a wig.’

They both looked at each other and smiled.

The Mystery of the Blue Train

Agatha Christie