

'Protheroe's coming over tomorrow evening and we're going over the accounts together,' I went on. 'I must finish preparing my talk for the C.E.M.S. today. Looking up a reference I became so engrossed in Canon Shirley's 'Reality' that I haven't got on as well as I should. What are you doing this afternoon, Griselda?'

'My duty,' said Griselda. 'My duty as the Vicarress. Tea and scandal at four-thirty.'

'Who is coming?'

Griselda ticked them off on her fingers with a glow of virtue on her face.

'Mrs Price Ridley, Miss Wetherby, Miss Hartnell and that terrible Miss Marple.'

'I rather like Miss Marple,' I said. 'She has, at least, a sense of humour.'

'She's the worst cat in the village,' said Griselda. 'And she always knows every single thing that happens—and draws the worst inferences from it.'

Griselda, as I have said, is much younger than I am. At my time of life, one knows that the worst is usually true.

'Well, don't expect me in for tea, Griselda,' said Dennis.

'Beast!' said Griselda.

'Yes, but look here, the Protheroes really did ask me for tennis today.'

'Beast!' said Griselda again.

Dennis beat a prudent retreat, and Griselda and I went together into my study.

'I wonder what we shall have for tea,' said Griselda seating herself on my writing table. 'Dr Stone and Miss Cram, I suppose, and perhaps Mrs Lestrang. By the way, I called on her yesterday, but she was out. Yes, I'm sure we shall have Mrs Lestrang for tea. It's so mysterious, isn't it, her arriving like this and taking a house down here, and hardly ever going outside it? Makes one think of detective stories. You know—"Who was she, the mysterious woman with the pale beautiful face? What was her past history? Nobody knew. There was something faintly sinister about her." I believe Dr Haydock knows something about her.'

'You read too many detective stories, Griselda,' I observed mildly.

'What about you?' she retorted. 'I was looking everywhere for "The Stain on the Stairs" the other day when you were in here writing a sermon. And at last I came in to ask you if you'd seen it anywhere, and what did I find?'

I had the grace to blush.

'I picked it up at random. A chance sentence caught my eye and—'

'I know those chance sentences,' said Griselda. She quoted impressively, 'And then a very curious thing happened—Griselda rose, crossed the room and kissed her elderly husband affectionately.'

She suited the action to the word.

'Is that a very curious thing?' I inquired.

'Of course it is,' said Griselda. 'Do you realize, Len, that I might have married a Cabinet Minister, a Baronet, a rich Company Promoter, three subalterns and a ne'er-do-well with attractive manners, and that instead I chose you? Didn't it astonish you very much?'

'At the time it did,' I replied. 'I have often wondered why you did it.'

Griselda sighed.

'It made me feel so powerful,' she murmured. 'The others thought me simply wonderful, and of course it would have been very nice for them to have me. But I'm everything you most dislike and disapprove of, and yet you couldn't withstand me! My vanity couldn't hold out against that. It's so much nicer to be a secret and delightful sin to anybody than to be a feather in his cap. I make you frightfully uncomfortable and stir you up the wrong way the whole time, and yet you adore me madly. You do adore me madly, don't you?'

'Naturally, I am very fond of you, my dear.'

'Oh! Len, you adore me. Do you remember that day when I stayed up in town and sent you a wire you never got because the postmistress's sister was having twins and she forgot to send it round? The state you got into, and you telephoned Scotland Yard and made the most frightful fuss.'

There are things one hates being reminded of. I had really been strangely foolish on the occasion in question. I said:

'If you don't mind, dear, I want to get on with the C.E.M.S.'

Griselda gave a sigh of intense irritation, ruffled my hair up on end, smoothed it down again, said:

'You don't deserve me. You really don't. I'll have an affair with the artist. I will—really and truly. And then think of the scandal in the parish.'

'There's a good deal already,' I said mildly.

Griselda laughed, blew me a kiss, and departed through the window.

Mrs Price Ridley is a devout member of my congregation. Attending early service on the anniversary of her son's death, she put a pound note into the offertory bag. Later, reading the amount of the collection posted up, she was pained to observe that one ten-shilling note was the highest item mentioned.

She complained to me about it, and I pointed out, very reasonably, that she must have made a mistake.

'We're none of us so young as we were,' I said, trying to turn it off tactfully. 'And we must pay the penalty of advancing years.'

Strangely enough my words only seemed to incense her further. She said that things had a very odd look and that she was surprised I didn't think so also. And she flounced away and, I gather, took her troubles to Colonel Protheroe. Protheroe is the kind of man who enjoys making a fuss on every conceivable occasion. He made a fuss. It is a pity he made it on a Wednesday. I teach in the Church Day School on Wednesday mornings, a proceeding that causes me acute nervousness and leaves me unsettled for the rest of the day.

'Well, I suppose he must have some fun,' said my wife, with the air of trying to sum up the position impartially. 'Nobody flutters round him and calls him the dear Vicar, and embroiders awful slippers for him, and gives him bedsocks for Christmas. Both his wife and his daughter are fed to the teeth with him. I suppose it makes him happy to feel important somewhere.'

'He needn't be offensive about it,' I said with some heat. 'I don't think he quite realized the implications of what he was saying. He wants to go over all the Church accounts—in case of defalcations—that was the word he used. Defalcations! Does he suspect me of embezzling the Church funds?'

'Nobody would suspect you of anything, darling,' said Griselda. 'You're so transparently above suspicion that really it would be a marvellous opportunity. I wish you'd embezzle the S.P.G. funds. I hate missionaries—I always have.'

I would have reproved her for that sentiment, but Mary entered at that moment with a partially cooked rice pudding. I made a mild protest, but Griselda said that the Japanese always ate half cooked rice and had marvellous brains in consequence.

'I daresay,' she said, 'that if you had a rice pudding like this every day till Sunday, you'd preach the most marvellous sermon.'

'Heaven forbid,' I said with a shudder.

acquaintance is a mystery to me. Marriage, I have always held, is a serious affair, to be entered into only after long deliberation and forethought, and suitability of tastes and inclinations is the most important consideration.

Griselda is nearly twenty years younger than myself. She is most distractingly pretty and quite incapable of taking anything seriously. She is incompetent in every way and extremely trying to live with. She treats the Parish as a kind of huge joke arranged for her amusement. I have endeavoured to form her mind and failed. I am more than ever convinced that celibacy is desirable for the clergy. I have frequently hinted as much to Griselda, but she has only laughed.

‘My dear,’ I said. ‘If you would only exercise a little care—’

‘I do sometimes,’ said Griselda. ‘But on the whole I think things go worse when I’m trying. I’m evidently not a housekeeper by nature. I find it better to leave things to Mary and just make up my mind to be uncomfortable and have nasty things to eat.’

‘And what about your husband, my dear?’ I said reproachfully and, proceeding to follow the example of the devil in quoting Scripture for his own ends, I added, ‘She looketh to the ways of her household.’

‘Think how lucky you are not to be torn to pieces by lions,’ said Griselda quickly interrupting. ‘Or burnt at the stake. Bad food and lots of dust and dead wasps is really nothing to make a fuss about. Tell me more about Colonel Protheroe. At any rate the early Christians were lucky enough not to have churchwardens.’

‘Pompous old brute,’ said Dennis. ‘No wonder his first wife ran away from him.’

‘I don’t see what else she could do,’ said my wife.

‘Griselda,’ I said sharply. ‘I will not have you speaking in that way.’

‘Darling,’ said my wife affectionately. ‘Tell me about him. What was the trouble? Was it Mr Hawes’ becking and nodding and crossing himself every other minute?’

Hawes is our new curate. He has been with us just over three weeks. He has High Church views and fasts on Fridays. Colonel Protheroe is a great opposer of ritual in any form.

‘Not this time. He did touch on it in passing. No, the whole trouble arose out of Mrs Price Ridley’s wretched pound note.’

Chapter 2

GRISELDA is a very irritating woman. On leaving the luncheon table, I had felt myself to be in a good mood for preparing a really forceful address for the Church of England Men’s Society. Now I felt restless and disturbed.

Just when I was really settling down to it, Lettice Protheroe drifted in.

I use the word ‘drifted’ advisedly. I have read novels in which young people are described as bursting with energy—joie de vivre, the magnificent vitality of youth. Personally, all the young people I come across have the air of amiable wraiths.

Lettice was particularly wraith-like this afternoon. She is a pretty girl, very tall and fair and completely vague. She drifted through the French window, absently pulled off the yellow beret she was wearing, and murmured vaguely with a kind of far-away surprise.

‘Oh! It’s you.’

There is a path from Old Hall through the woods which comes out by our garden gate, so that most people coming from there come in at that gate and up to the study window instead of going a long way round by the road and coming to the front door. I was not surprised at Lettice coming in this way, but I did a little resent her attitude.

If you come to a Vicarage, you ought to be prepared to find a Vicar.

She came in and collapsed in a crumpled heap in one of my big arm chairs. She plucked aimlessly at her hair, staring at the ceiling.

‘Is Dennis anywhere about?’

‘I haven’t seen him since lunch. I understood he was going to play tennis at your place.’

‘Oh!’ said Lettice. ‘I hope he isn’t. He won’t find anybody there.’

‘He said you’d asked him.’

‘I believe I did. Only that was Friday. And today’s Tuesday.’

'It's Wednesday,' I said.

'Oh! how dreadful,' said Lettice. 'That means that I've forgotten to go to lunch with some people for the third time.'

Fortunately it didn't seem to worry her much.

'Is Griselda anywhere about?'

'I expect you'll find her in the studio in the garden—sitting to Lawrence Redding.'

'There's been quite a shemuzzle about him,' said Lettice. 'With Father, you know. Father's dreadful.'

'What was the she—whatever it was, about?' I inquired.

'About his painting me. Father found out about it. Why shouldn't I be painted in my bathing dress? If I go on a beach in it, why shouldn't I be painted in it?'

Lettice paused and then went on.

'It's really absurd—Father forbidding a young man the house. Of course, Lawrence and I simply shriek about it. I shall come and be done here in your studio.'

'No, my dear,' I said. 'Not if your father forbids it.'

'Oh! dear,' said Lettice sighing. 'How tiresome everyone is. I feel shattered. Definitely. If only I had some money I'd go away, but without it I can't. If only Father would be decent and die, I should be all right.'

'You must not say things like that, Lettice.'

'Well, if he doesn't want me to want him to die, he shouldn't be so horrible over money. I don't wonder Mother left him. Do you know for years I believed she was dead. What sort of a young man did she run away with? Was he nice?'

'It was before your father came to live here.'

'I wonder what's become of her. I expect Anne will have an affair with someone soon. Anne hates me—she's quite decent to me, but she hates me. She's getting old and she doesn't like it. That's the age you break out, you know.'

I wondered if Lettice was going to spend the entire afternoon in my study.

'You haven't seen my gramophone records, have you?' she asked.

'No.'

'How tiresome. I know I've left them somewhere. And I've lost the dog. And my wristwatch is somewhere, only it doesn't much matter because it

Chapter 1

IT is difficult to know quite where to begin this story, but I have fixed my choice on a certain Wednesday at luncheon at the Vicarage. The conversation, though in the main irrelevant to the matter in hand, yet contained one or two suggestive incidents which influenced later developments.

I had just finished carving some boiled beef (remarkably tough by the way), and on resuming my seat I remarked, in a spirit most unbecoming to my cloth, that anyone who murdered Colonel Protheroe would be doing the world at large a service.

My young nephew, Dennis, said instantly:

'That'll be remembered against you when the old boy is found bathed in blood. Mary will give evidence, won't you, Mary? And describe how you brandished the carving knife in a vindictive manner.'

Mary, who is in service at the Vicarage as a stepping stone to better things and higher wages, merely said, in a loud businesslike voice, 'Greens,' and thrust a cracked dish at him in a truculent manner.

My wife said in a sympathetic voice, 'Has he been very trying?'

I did not reply at once, for Mary, setting the greens on the table with a bang, proceeded to thrust a dish of singularly moist and unpleasant dumplings under my nose. I said, 'No, thank you,' and she deposited the dish with a clatter on the table and left the room.

'It is a pity that I am such a shocking housekeeper,' said my wife with a tinge of genuine regret in her voice.

I was inclined to agree with her. My wife's name is Griselda—a highly suitable name for a parson's wife. But there the suitability ends. She is not in the least meek.

I have always been of the opinion that a clergyman should be unmarried. Why I should have urged Griselda to marry me at the end of twenty-four hours' won't go. Oh! dear, I am so sleepy. I can't think why, because I didn't get up till eleven. But life's very shattering, don't you think? Oh! dear, I must go. I'm going to see Dr Stone's barrow at three o'clock.'

To Rosalind

I glanced at the clock and remarked that it was now five and twenty to four.

'Oh! is it? How dreadful if they've waited or if they've gone without me. I suppose I'd better go down and do something about it.'

She got up and drifted out again murmuring over her shoulder.

'You'll tell Dennis, won't you?'

I said 'Yes' mechanically, only realizing too late that I had no idea what it was I was to tell Dennis. But I reflected that in all probability it did not matter. I fell to cogitating on the subject of Dr Stone, a well known archaeologist who had recently come to stay at the Blue Boar, while he superintended the excavation of a barrow situated on Colonel Protheroe's property. There had already been several disputes between him and the Colonel. I was amused at his appointment to take Lettice to see the operations.

It occurred to me that Lettice Protheroe was something of a minx. I wondered how she would get on with the archaeologist's secretary, Miss Cram. Miss Cram is a healthy young woman of twenty-five, noisy in manner, with a high colour, fine animal spirits and a mouth that always seems to have more than its full share of teeth.

Village opinion is divided as to whether she is no better than she should be, or else a young woman of iron virtue who purposes to become Mrs Stone at an early opportunity. She is in every way a great contrast to Lettice.

I could imagine that the state of things at Old Hall might not be too happy. Colonel Protheroe had married again some five years previously. The second Mrs Protheroe was a remarkably handsome woman in a rather unusual style. I had always guessed that the relations between her and her stepdaughter were not too happy.

I had one more interruption. This time, it was my curate, Hawes. He wanted to know the details of my interview with Protheroe. I told him that the Colonel had deplored his 'Romish tendencies,' but that the real purpose of his visit had been on quite another matter. At the same time, I entered a protest of my own, and told him plainly that he must conform to my ruling. On the whole, he took my remarks very well.

I felt rather remorseful, when he had gone, for not liking him better. These irrational likes and dislikes that one takes to people are, I am sure, very unchristian.

With a sigh, I realized that the hands of the clock on my writing table pointed to a quarter to five, a sign that it was really half past four, and I made my way to the drawing room.

Four of my parishioners were assembled there with teacups. Griselda sat behind the tea table trying to look natural in her environment, but only succeeding in looking more out of place than usual.

I shook hands all round and sat down between Miss Marple and Miss Wetherby.

Miss Marple is a white-haired old lady with a gentle appealing manner—Miss Wetherby is a mixture of vinegar and gush. Of the two Miss Marple is much the more dangerous.

‘We were just talking,’ said Griselda in a honey-sweet voice, ‘about Dr Stone and Miss Cram.’

A ribald rhyme concocted by Dennis shot through my head.

‘Miss Cram doesn’t give a damn.’

I had a sudden yearning to say it out loud and observe the effect, but fortunately I refrained.

Miss Wetherby said tersely:

‘No nice girl would do it,’ and shut her thin lips disapprovingly.

‘Do what?’ I inquired.

‘Be a secretary to an unmarried man,’ said Miss Wetherby in a horrified tone.

‘Oh! my dear,’ said Miss Marple. ‘I think married ones are the worst. Remember poor Mollie Carter.’

‘Married men living apart from their wives are, of course, notorious,’ said Miss Wetherby.

‘And even some of the ones living with their wives,’ murmured Miss Marple.

‘I remember—’

I interrupted these unsavoury reminiscences.

‘But surely,’ I said, ‘in these days a girl can take a post in just the same way as a man does.’

Chapter 17	123
Chapter 18	129
Chapter 19	137
Chapter 20	145
Chapter 21	151
Chapter 22	155
Chapter 23	167
Chapter 24	175
Chapter 25	183
Chapter 26	195
Chapter 27	207
Chapter 28	211
Chapter 29	213
Chapter 30	219
Chapter 31	227
Chapter 32	231

Contents

Chapter 1	1
Chapter 2	7
Chapter 3	15
Chapter 4	23
Chapter 5	31
Chapter 6	39
Chapter 7	47
Chapter 8	51
Chapter 9	57
Chapter 10	65
Chapter 11	73
Chapter 12	81
Chapter 13	91
Chapter 14	97
Chapter 15	103
Chapter 16	111

‘To come away to the country? And stay at the same hotel?’ said Mrs Price Ridley in a severe voice.

Miss Wetherby murmured to Miss Marple in a low voice:

‘And all the bedrooms on the same floor...’

They exchanged glances.

Miss Harnell, who is weather-beaten and jolly and much dreaded by the poor, observed in a loud, hearty voice:

‘The poor man will be caught before he knows where he is. He’s as innocent as a babe unborn, you can see that.’

Curious what turns of phrase we employ. None of the ladies present would have dreamed of alluding to an actual baby till it was safely in the cradle, visible to all.

‘Disgusting, I call it,’ continued Miss Harnell with her usual tactlessness. ‘The man must be at least twenty-five years older than she is.’

Three female voices rose at once making disconnected remarks about the Choir Boys’ Outing, the regrettable incident at the last Mothers’ Meeting, and the draughts in the Church. Miss Marple twinkled at Griselda.

‘Don’t you think,’ said my wife, ‘that Miss Cram may just like having an interesting job, and that she considers Dr Stone just as an employer?’

There was a silence. Evidently none of the four ladies agreed. Miss Marple broke the silence by patting Griselda on the arm.

‘My dear,’ she said, ‘you are very young. The young have such innocent minds.’

Griselda said indignantly that she hadn’t got at all an innocent mind.

‘Naturally,’ said Miss Marple, unheeding of the protest, ‘you think the best of everyone.’

‘Do you really think she wants to marry that bald-headed, dull man?’

‘I understand he is quite well off,’ said Miss Marple. ‘Rather a violent temper, I’m afraid. He had quite a serious quarrel with Colonel Protheroe the other day.’

Everyone leaned forward interestedly.

‘Colonel Protheroe accused him of being an ignoramus.’

‘How like Colonel Protheroe, and how absurd,’ said Mrs Price Ridley.

‘Very like Colonel Protheroe, but I don’t know about it being absurd,’ said Miss Marple. ‘You remember the woman who came down here and said she represented Welfare, and after taking subscriptions she was never heard of again, and proved to have nothing whatever to do with Welfare. One is so inclined to be trusting and take people at their own valuation.'

I should never have dreamed of describing Miss Marple as trusting.

'There's been some fuss about that young artist, Mr Redding, hasn't there?' asked Miss Wetherby.

Miss Marple nodded.

'Colonel Protheroe turned him out of the house. It appears he was painting Lettice in her bathing dress.'

Suitable sensation!

'I always thought there was something between them,' said Mrs Price Ridley. 'That young fellow is always mouching off up there. Pity the girl hasn't got a mother. A stepmother is never the same thing.'

'I daresay Mrs Protheroe does her best,' said Miss Hartnell.

'Girls are so sly,' deplored Mrs Price Ridley.

'Quite a romance, isn't it?' said the softer hearted Miss Wetherby. 'He's a very good-looking young fellow.'

'But loose,' said Miss Hartnell. 'Bound to be. An artist! Paris! Models! The Altogether!'

'Painting her in her bathing dress,' said Mrs Price Ridley.

'Not quite nice.'

'He's painting me too,' said Griselda.

'But not in your bathing dress, dear,' said Miss Marple.

'It might be worse,' said Griselda solemnly.

'Naughty girl,' said Miss Hartnell, taking the joke broadmindedly. Everybody else looked slightly shocked.

'Did dear Lettice tell you of the trouble?' asked Miss Marple of me.

'Tell me?'

'Yes. I saw her pass through the garden and go round to the study window.' Miss Marple always sees everything. Gardening is as good as a smoke screen, and the habit of observing birds through powerful glasses can always be turned to account.

'She mentioned it, yes,' I admitted.

'Mr Hawes looked worried,' said Miss Marple. 'I hope he hasn't been working too hard.'

The Murder at the Vicarage

Agatha Christie