

'I was at first,' she said. 'She was such a pretty little girl. I don't think I am now. I don't know why. Perhaps it's because she doesn't like me. I like being liked, you know.'

'We all do,' I said, and Anne Protheroe smiled.

I had one more task to perform. That was to get a word alone with Lettice Protheroe. I managed that easily enough, catching sight of her in the deserted drawing room. Giselda and Gladys Cram were out in the garden.

I went in and shut the door.

'Lettice,' I said, 'I want to speak to you about something.'

She looked up indifferently.

'Yes?'

I had thought beforehand what to say. I held out the lapis earring and said quietly,

'Why did you drop that in my study?'

I saw her stiffen for a moment—it was almost instantaneous. Her recovery was so quick that I myself could hardly have sworn to the movement. Then she said carelessly:

'I never dropped anything in your study. That's not mine. That's Anne's.'

'I know that,' I said.

'Well, why ask me then? Anne must have dropped it.'

'Mrs Protheroe has only been in my study once since the murder, and then she was wearing black and so would not have been likely to have had on a blue earring.'

'In that case,' said Lettice, 'I suppose she must have dropped it before.' She added, 'That's only logical.'

'It's very logical,' I said. 'I suppose you don't happen to remember when your stepmother was wearing these earrings last?'

'Oh! She looked at me with a puzzled, trustful gaze. 'Is it very important?'

'It might be,' I said.

'I'll try and think.' She sat there knitting her brows. I have never seen Lettice Protheroe look more charming than she did at that moment. 'Oh! yes,' she said suddenly. 'She had them on on Thursday. I remember now.'

'Thursday,' I said slowly, 'was the day of the murder. Mrs Protheroe came to the studio in the garden that day, but, if you remember, in her evidence, she only came as far as the study window, not inside the room.'

'Where did you find this?'

'Rolled underneath the desk.'

'Then it looks, doesn't it,' said Lettice coolly, 'as though she hadn't spoken the truth?'

'You mean that she came right in and stood by the desk?'

'Well, it looks like it, doesn't it?'

Her eyes met mine calmly.

'If you want to know,' she said calmly, 'I never have thought she was speaking the truth.'

'And I know you are not, Lettice.'

'What do you mean?'

She was startled.

'I mean,' I said, 'that the last time I saw this earring was on Friday morning when I came up here with Colonel Melchett. It was lying with its fellow on your stepmother's dressing table. I actually handled them both.'

'Oh!—' She wavered, then suddenly flung herself sideways over the arm of her chair and burst into tears. Her long, fair hair hung down almost touching the floor. It was a strange attitude—beautiful and unrestrained.

I let her sob for some moments in silence and then I said very gently:

'Lettice, why did you do it?'

'What?'

She sprang up, flinging her hair wildly back. She looked wild—almost terrified.

'What do you mean?'

'What made you do it? Was it jealousy? Dislike of Anne?'

'Oh!—Oh! yes.' She pushed the hair back from her face and seemed suddenly to regain complete self-possession. 'Yes, you can call it jealousy. I've always disliked Anne—ever since she came queening it here. I put the damned thing under the desk. I hoped it would get her into trouble. It would have done if you hadn't been such a Nosey Parker, fingering things on dressing tables. Anyway, it isn't a clergyman's business to go about helping the police.' It was a spiteful childish outburst. I took no notice of it. Indeed at that moment, she seemed a very pathetic child.

Her childish attempt at vengeance against Anne seemed hardly to be taken seriously. I told her so, and added that I should return the earring to her and say nothing of the circumstances in which I had found it. She seemed rather touched by that.

'That's nice of you,' she said.

She paused a minute and then said, keeping her face averted and evidently choosing her words with care:

'You know, Mr Clement, I should—I should get Dennis away from here soon, if I were you. I—I think it would be better.'

'Dennis?' I raised my eyebrows in slight surprise but with a trace of amusement too.

'I think it would be better,' she added, still in the same awkward manner.

'I'm sorry about Dennis. I didn't think he—anyway, I'm sorry.'

We left it at that.

'No. I don't. Honestly I don't. What I do think is that that girl knows something—or might know something. I wanted to study her at close quarters.'

'And the very night she arrives, that picture is slashed,' I said thoughtfully.

'You think she did it? But why? It seems so utterly absurd and impossible.'

'It seems to me utterly impossible and absurd that your husband should have been murdered in my study,' I said bitterly. 'But he was.'

'I know.' She laid her hand on my arm. 'It's dreadful for you. I do realize that, though I haven't said very much about it.'

I took the blue lapis lazuli earring from my pocket and held it out to her.

'This is yours, I think?'

'Oh! yes.' She held out her hand for it with a pleased smile. 'Where did you find it?'

But I did not put the jewel into her outstretched hand.

'Would you mind,' I said, 'if I kept it a little longer?'

'Why, certainly.' She looked puzzled and a little inquiring. I did not satisfy her curiosity.

Instead I asked her how she was situated financially.

'It is an impertinent question,' I said. 'But I really do not mean it as such.'

'I don't think it's impertinent at all. You and Griselda are the best friends I have here. And I like that funny old Miss Marple. Lucius was very well off, you know. He left things pretty equally divided between me and Lettice. Old Hall goes to me, but Lettice is to be allowed to choose enough furniture to furnish a small house, and she is left a separate sum for the purpose of buying one, so as to even things up.'

'What are her plans, do you know?'

Anne made a comical grimace.

'She doesn't tell them to me. I imagine she will leave here as soon as possible. She doesn't like me—she never has. I daresay it's my fault, though I've really always tried to be decent. But I suppose any girl resents a young stepmother.'

'Are you fond of her?' I asked bluntly.

She did not reply at once, which convinced me that Anne Protheroe is a very honest woman.

'I'm going to live here for at least another six months!' She said it defiantly. 'I don't want to. I hate the idea of living here. But I think it's the only thing to be done. Otherwise people will say that I ran away—that I had a guilty conscience.'

'Surely not.'

'Oh! yes, they will. Especially when—' She paused and then said: 'When the six months are up—I am going to marry Lawrence.' Her eyes met mine. 'We're neither of us going to wait any longer.'

'I supposed,' I said, 'that that would happen.'

Suddenly she broke down, burying her head in her hands.

'You don't know how grateful I am to you—you don't know. We'd said good-bye to each other—he was going away. I feel—I feel not so awful about Lucius' death. If we'd been planning to go away together, and he'd died then—it wouldn't be so awful now. But you made us both see how wrong it would be. That's why I'm grateful.'

'I, too, am thankful,' I said gravely.

'All the same, you know,' she sat up. 'Unless the real murderer is found, they'll always think it was Lawrence. Oh! yes, they will. And especially when he marries me.'

'My dear, Dr Haydock's evidence made it perfectly clear—'

'What do people care about evidence? They don't even know about it. And medical evidence never means anything to outsiders anyway. That's another reason why I'm staying on here. Mr Clement, I'm going to find out the truth.'

Her eyes flashed as she spoke. She added:

'That's why I asked that girl here.'

'Miss Cram?'

'Yes.'

'You did ask her, then. I mean, it was your idea?'

'Entirely. Oh! as a matter of fact, she whined a bit. At the inquest—she was there when I arrived. No, I asked her here deliberately.'

'But surely,' I cried, 'you don't think that that silly young woman could have had anything to do with the crime?'

'It's awfully easy to appear silly, Mr Clement. It's one of the easiest things in the world.'

'Then you really think—?'

Chapter 23

IN the way back, I proposed to Griselda that we should make a detour and go round by the barrow. I was anxious to see if the police were at work and, if so, what they had found. Griselda, however, had things to do at home, so I was left to make the expedition on my own.

I found Constable Hurst in charge of operations.

'No sign so far, sir,' he reported, 'and yet it stands to reason that this is the only place for a cache.'

His use of the word cache puzzled me for the moment, as he pronounced it catch, but his real meaning occurred to me almost at once.

'Whatimeanersay is, sir, where else could the young woman be going, starting into the wood by that path? It leads to Old Hall, and it leads here, and that's about all.'

'I suppose,' I said, 'that Inspector Slack would disdain such a simple course as asking the young lady straight out.'

'Anxious not to put the wind up her,' said Hurst. 'Anything she writes to Stone or he writes to her may throw light on things—once she knows we're on to her, she'd shut up like that.'

Like what exactly was left in doubt, but I personally doubted Miss Gladys Cram ever being shut up in the way described. It was impossible to imagine her as other than overflowing with conversation.

'When a man's an h'impstor, you want to know why he's an h'impstor,' said Constable Hurst didactically.

'Naturally,' I said.

'And the answer is to be found in this here barrow—or else why was he forever messing about with it?'

'A raison d'être for prowling about,' I suggested, but this bit of French was too much for the constable. He revenged himself for not understanding it by saying coldly:

'That's the h'amateur's point of view.'

'Anyway, you haven't found the suitcase,' I said.

'We shall do, sir. Not a doubt of it.'

'I'm not so sure,' I said. 'I've been thinking. Miss Marple said it was quite a short time before the girl reappeared empty-handed. In that case, she wouldn't have had time to get up here and back.'

'You can't take any notice of what old ladies say. When they've seen something curious, and are waiting all eager like, why time simply flies for them. And anyway, no lady knows anything about time.'

I often wonder why the whole world is so prone to generalize. Generalizations are seldom or ever true, and are usually utterly inaccurate. I have a poor sense of time myself (hence the keeping of my clock fast), and Miss Marple, I should say, has a very acute one. Her clocks keep time to the minute, and she herself is rigidly punctual on every occasion.

However I had no intention of arguing with Constable Hurst on the point. I wished him good afternoon and good luck, and went on my way.

It was just as I was nearing home that the idea came to me. There was nothing to lead up to it. It just flashed into my brain as a possible solution.

You will remember that on my first search of the path, the day after the murder, I had found the bushes disturbed in a certain place. They proved, or so I thought at the time, to have been disturbed by Lawrence, bent on the same errand as myself.

But I remembered that afterwards he and I together had come upon another faintly marked trail which proved to be that of the Inspector. On thinking it over, I distinctly remembered that the first trail (Lawrence's) had been much more noticeable than the second, as though more than one person had been passing that way. And I reflected that that was probably what had drawn Lawrence's attention to it in the first instance. Supposing that it had originally been made by either Dr Stone or else Miss Cram?

I remembered, or else I imagined remembering, that there had been several withered leaves on broken twigs. If so, the trail could not have been made the afternoon of our search.

I was just approaching the spot in question. I recognized it easily enough, and once more forced my way through the bushes. This time I noticed fresh twigs broken. Someone had passed this way since Lawrence and myself.

I gave a gasp of surprise. The picture was evidently a portrait in oils, but the face had been hacked and cut in such a savage way as to render it unrecognizable. Moreover the cuts were clearly quite fresh.

'What an extraordinary thing,' I said.

'Isn't it? Tell me, can you think of any explanation?'

I shook my head.

'There's a kind of savagery about it,' I said, 'that I don't like. It looks as though it had been done in a fit of maniacal rage.'

'Yes, that's what I thought.'

'What is the portrait?'

'I haven't the least idea. I have never seen it before. All these things were in the attic when I married Lucius and came here to live. I have never been through them or bothered about them.'

'Extraordinary,' I commented.

I stooped down and examined the other pictures. They were very much what you would expect to find—some very mediocre landscapes, some oleographs, and a few cheaply framed reproductions.

There was nothing else helpful. A large, old-fashioned trunk, of the kind that used to be called an 'ark,' had the initials E.P. upon it. I raised the lid. It was empty. Nothing else in the attic was the least suggestive.

'It really is a most amazing occurrence,' I said. 'It's so—senseless.'

'Yes,' said Anne. 'That frightens me a little.'

There was nothing more to see. I accompanied her down to her sitting room where she closed the door.

'Do you think I ought to do anything about it? Tell the police?'

I hesitated.

'It's hard to say on the face of it whether—'

'It has anything to do with the murder or not,' finished Anne. 'I know. That's what is so difficult. On the face of it, there seems no connection whatever.'

'No,' I said, 'but it is another Peculiar Thing.'

We both sat silent with puzzled brows.

'What are your plans, if I may ask?' I said presently.

She lifted her head.

my own, but she seemed much the same vague creature as usual. Extremely pretty—that in fairness I had to admit. She was still not wearing mourning, but was dressed in a shade of pale green that brought out all the delicacy of her fair colouring.

After we had had coffee, Anne said quietly:

‘I want to have a little talk with the Vicar. I will take him up to my sitting room.’

At last I was to learn the reason of our summons. I rose and followed her up the stairs. She paused at the door of the room. As I was about to speak, she stretched out a hand to stop me. She remained listening, looking down towards the hall.

‘Good. They are going out into the garden. No—don’t go in there. We can go straight up.’

Much to my surprise she led the way along the corridor to the extremity of the wing. Here a narrow, ladder-like staircase rose to the floor above and she mounted it, I following. We found ourselves in a dusty boarded passage. Anne opened a door and led me into a large, dim attic which was evidently used as a lumber room. There were trunks there, old broken furniture, a few stacked pictures, and the many countless odds and ends which a lumber room collects.

My surprise was so evident that she smiled faintly.

‘First of all, I must explain. I am sleeping very lightly just now. Last night—or rather this morning about three o’clock—I was convinced that I heard someone moving about the house. I listened for some time, and at last got up and came out to see. Out on the landing I realized that the sounds came, not from down below, but from up above. I came along to the foot of these stairs. Again I thought I heard a sound. I called up ‘Is anybody there?’ But there was no answer, and I heard nothing more, so I assumed that my nerves had been playing tricks on me and went back to bed.

‘However, early this morning, I came up here—simply out of curiosity. And I found this!’

She stooped down and turned round a picture that was leaning against the wall with the back of the canvas towards us.

I soon came to the place where I had encountered Lawrence. The faint trail, however, persisted farther, and I continued to follow it. Suddenly it widened out into a little clearing, which showed signs of recent upheaval. I say a clearing, because the denseness of the undergrowth was thinned out there, but the branches of the trees met overhead and the whole place was not more than a few feet across.

On the other side, the undergrowth grew densely again and it seemed quite clear that no one had forced a way through it recently. Nevertheless, it seemed to have been disturbed in one place.

I went across and knelted down, thrusting the bushes aside with both hands. A glint of a shiny brown surface rewarded me. Full of excitement I thrust my arm in and with a good deal of difficulty I extracted a small brown suitcase.

I uttered an ejaculation of triumph. I had been successful. Coldly snubbed by Constable Hurst, I had yet proved right in my reasoning. Here without doubt was the suitcase carried by Miss Cram. I tried the hasp, but it was locked.

As I rose to my feet, I noticed a small brownish crystal lying on the ground. Almost automatically, I picked it up and slipped it into my pocket.

Then, grasping my find by the handle, I retraced my steps to the path.

As I climbed over the stile into the lane, an agitated voice near at hand called out.

‘Oh! Mr Clement. You’ve found it! How clever of you!’

Mentally registering the fact that, in the art of seeing without being seen, Miss Marple had no rival, I balanced my find on the palms between us.

‘That’s the one,’ said Miss Marple. ‘I’d know it anywhere.’

This, I thought, was a slight exaggeration. There are thousands of cheap shiny suitcases all exactly alike. No one could recognize one, particularly one seen from such a distance away by moonlight, but I realized that the whole business of the suitcase was Miss Marple’s particular triumph and, as such, she was entitled to a little pardonable exaggeration.

‘It’s locked, I suppose, Mr Clement?’

‘Yes. I’m just going to take it down to the police station.’

‘You don’t think it would be better to telephone?’

Of course unquestionably it would be better to telephone. To stride through the village, suitcase in hand, would be to court a probably undesirable publicity.

So I unlatched Miss Marple's garden gate and entered the house by the French window, and from the sanctity of the drawing room, with the door shut, I telephoned my news.

The result was that Inspector Slack announced he would be up himself in a couple of jiffies.

When he arrived it was in his most cantankerous mood.

'So we've got it, have we?' he said. 'You know, sir, you shouldn't keep things to yourself. If you've any reason to believe you know where the article in question was hidden, you ought to have reported it to the proper authorities.'

'It was a pure accident,' I said. 'The idea just happened to occur to me.'

'And that's a likely tale. Nearly three quarters of a mile of woodland, and you go right to the proper spot and lay your hand upon it.'

I would have given Inspector Slack the steps in reasoning which led me to this particular spot, but he had achieved his usual result of putting my back up. I said nothing.

'Well!' said Inspector Slack, eyeing the suitcase with dislike and would-be indifference. 'I suppose we might as well have a look at what's inside.'

He had brought an assortment of keys and wire with him. The lock was a cheap affair. In a couple of seconds the case was open.

I don't know what we had expected to find—something sternly sensational, I imagine. But the first thing that met our eyes was a greasy plaid scarf. The Inspector lifted it out. Next came a faded dark blue overcoat, very much the worse for wear. A checked cap followed.

'A shoddy lot,' said the Inspector.

A pair of boots, very down at heel and battered, came next. At the bottom of the suitcase was a parcel done up in newspaper.

'Fancy shirt, I suppose,' said the Inspector bitterly, as he tore it open.

A moment later he had caught his breath in surprise. For inside the parcel were some demure little silver objects and a round platter of the same metal.

Miss Marple gave a shrill exclamation of recognition.

account, the initiative had come from Anne, but I wondered if that were really so. The first mention of disliking to be at the Blue Bear alone might have easily come from the girl herself. While keeping an open mind on the subject, I did not fancy that Miss Cram was strictly truthful.

At that moment Anne Protheroe entered the room.

She was dressed very quietly in black. She carried in her hand a Sunday paper, which she held out to me with a rueful glance.

'I've never had any experience of this sort of thing. It's pretty ghastly, isn't it? I saw a reporter at the inquest. I just said that I was terribly upset and had nothing to say, and then he asked me if I wasn't very anxious to find my husband's murderer, and I said 'Yes.' And then whether I had any suspicions and I said 'No.' And whether I didn't think the crime showed local knowledge, and I said it seemed to, certainly. And that was all. And now look at this!'

In the middle of the page was a photograph, evidently taken at least ten years ago—Heaven knows where they had dug it out. There were large headlines.

WIDOW DECLARES SHE WILL NEVER REST TILL SHE HAS HUNTED DOWN HUSBAND'S MURDERER.

Mrs Protheroe, the widow of the murdered man, is certain that the murderer must be looked for locally. She has suspicions but no certainty. She declared herself prostrated with grief, but reiterated her determination to hunt down the murderer.

'It doesn't sound like me, does it?' said Anne.

'I daresay it might have been worse,' I said handing back the paper.

'Impudent, aren't they?' said Miss Cram. 'I'd like to see one of those fellows trying to get something out of me.'

By the twinkle in Griselda's eye, I was convinced that she regarded this statement as being more literally true than Miss Cram intended it to appear. Luncheon was announced and we went in. Lettice did not come in till half way through the meal, when she drifted into the empty place with a smile for Griselda and a nod for me. I watched her with some attention, for reasons of hope myself they'll never find out. I should hate to see Slack promoted, going about swelling with importance over his cleverness.'

I am human enough to feel that I agreed over the matter of Slack's promotion. A man who goes about systematically rubbing people up the wrong way cannot hope to be popular.

'Dr Haydock thinks rather like I do,' went on Dennis. 'He'd never give a murderer up to justice. He said so.'

I think that that is the danger of Haydock's views. They may be sound in themselves—it is not for me to say—but they produce an impression on the young, careless mind which I am sure Haydock himself never meant to convey. Griselda looked out of the window and remarked that there were reporters in the garden.

'I suppose they're photographing the study windows again,' she said with a sigh.

We had suffered a good deal in this way. There was first the idle curiosity of the village—everyone had come to gape and stare. There were next the reporters armed with cameras, and the village again to watch the reporters. In the end we had to have a constable from Much Benham on duty outside the window.

'Well,' I said, 'the funeral is tomorrow morning. After that, surely, the excitement will die down.'

I noticed a few reporters hanging about Old Hall when we arrived there. They accosted me with various queries, to which I gave the invariable answer (we had found it the best) that I had nothing to say.

We were shown by the butler into the drawing room, the sole occupant of which turned out to be Miss Cram—apparently in a state of high enjoyment.

'This is a surprise, isn't it?' she said as she shook hands. 'I never should have thought of such a thing, but Mrs Protheroe is kind, isn't she? And, of course, it isn't what you might call nice for a young girl to be staying alone at a place like the Blue Boar, reporters about and all. And, of course, it's not as though I haven't been able to make myself useful—you really need a secretary at a time like this, and Miss Protheroe doesn't do anything to help, does she?'

I was amused to notice that the old animosity against Leticie persisted, but that the girl had apparently become a warm partisan of Anne's. At the same time I wondered if the story of her coming here was strictly accurate. In her

'The trencher salts,' she exclaimed. 'Colonel Protheroe's trencher salts, and the Charles II tazza. Did you ever hear of such a thing?'

The Inspector had got very red.

'So that was the game,' he muttered. 'Robbery. But I can't make it out. There's been no mention of these things being missing.'

'Perhaps they haven't discovered the loss,' I suggested. 'I presume these valuable things would not have been kept out in common use. Colonel Protheroe probably kept them locked away in a safe.'

'I must investigate this,' said the Inspector. 'I'll go right up to Old Hall now. So that's why our Dr Stone made himself scarce. What with the murder and one thing and another, he was afraid we'd get wind of his activities. As likely as not his belongings might have been searched. He got the girl to hide them in the wood with a suitable change of clothing. He meant to come back by a roundabout route and go off with them one night while she stayed here to disarm suspicion. Well, there's one thing to the good. This lets him out over the murder. He'd nothing to do with that. Quite a different game.'

He repacked the suitcase and took his departure, refusing Miss Marple's offer of a glass of sherry.

'Well, that's one mystery cleared up,' I said with a sigh. 'What Slack says is quite true; there are no grounds for suspecting him of the murder. Everything's accounted for quite satisfactorily.'

'It really would seem so,' said Miss Marple. 'Although one never can be quite certain, can one?'

'There's a complete lack of motive,' I pointed out. 'He'd got what he came for and was clearing out.'

'Y—es.'

She was clearly not quite satisfied, and I looked at her in some curiosity. She hastened to answer my inquiring gaze with a kind of apologetic eagerness.

'I've no doubt I am quite wrong. I'm so stupid about these things. But I just wondered—I mean this silver is very valuable, is it not?'

'A tazza sold the other day for over a thousand pounds, I believe.'

'I mean—it's not the value of the metal.'

'No, it's what one might call a connoisseur's value.'

'That's what I mean. The sale of such things would take a little time to arrange, or, even if it was arranged, it couldn't be carried through without secrecy. I mean—if the robbery were reported and a hue and cry were raised, well, the things couldn't be marketed at all.'

'I don't quite see what you mean?' I said.

'I know I'm putting it badly.' She became more flustered and apologetic. 'But it seems to me that—that the things couldn't just have been abstracted, so to speak. The only satisfactory thing to do would be to replace these things with copies. Then, perhaps, the robbery wouldn't be discovered for some time.'

'That's a very ingenious idea,' I said.

'It would be the only way to do it, wouldn't it? And if so, of course, as you say, once the substitution had been accomplished, there wouldn't have been any reason for murdering Colonel Protheroe—quite the reverse.'

'Exactly,' I said. 'That's what I said.'

'Yes, but I just wondered—I don't know, of course—and Colonel Protheroe always talked a lot about doing things before he actually did do them, and of course sometimes never did them at all, but he did say—'

'Yes?'

'That he was going to have all his things valued—a man down from London. For probate—no, that's when you're dead—for insurance. Someone told him that was the thing to do. He talked about it a great deal, and the importance of having it done. Of course, I don't know if he had made any actual arrangement, but if he had...'

'I see,' I said slowly.

'Of course, the moment the expert saw the silver, he'd know, and then Colonel Protheroe would remember having shown the things to Dr Stone—I wonder if it was done then—legerdemain, don't they call it? So clever—and then, well, the fat would be in the fire, to use an old-fashioned expression.'

'I see your idea,' I said. 'I think we ought to find out for certain.'

I went once more to the telephone. In a few minutes I was through to Old Hall and speaking to Anne Protheroe.

'No, it's nothing very important. Has the Inspector arrived yet? Oh! well, he's on his way. Mrs Protheroe, can you tell me if the contents of Old Hall were ever valued? What's that you say?'

Her answer came clear and prompt. I thanked her, replaced the receiver and turned to Miss Marple.

Poor lad. Galflove is a virulent disease. I forebore to say any of the obvious and probably irritating things which come so easily to one's lips. Instead I said good night, and went up to bed.

I took the eight o'clock service the following morning, and when I returned found Griselda sitting at the breakfast table with an open note in her hand. It was from Anne Protheroe.

Dear Griselda,

If you and the Vicar could come up and lunch here quietly today, I should be so very grateful. Something very strange has occurred and I should like Mr Clement's advice.

Please don't mention this when you come, as I have said nothing to anyone.

With love,

Yours affectionately,

ANNE PROTHEROE.

'We must go, of course,' said Griselda.

I agreed.

'I wonder what can have happened?'

I wondered too.

'You know,' I said to Griselda, 'I don't feel we are really at the end of this case yet.'

'You mean not till someone has really been arrested?'

'No,' I said. 'I didn't mean that. I mean that there are ramifications, undercurrents, that we know nothing about. There are a whole lot of things to clear up before we get at the truth.'

'You mean things that don't really matter, but that get in the way?'

'Yes, I think that expresses my meaning very well.'

'I think we're all making a great fuss,' said Dennis, helping himself to marmalade. 'It's a jolly good thing old Protheroe is dead. Nobody liked him. Oh! I know the police have got to worry—it's their job. But I rather